INFORMATION

ACCEPTANCE OF FOREIGN STUDENTS IN JAPANESE UNIVERSITIES

Several Japanese universities have had significant experience in hosting foreign students. At first, they admit their applicants as research students for six months, and let such students, whose knowledge of Japanese language is insufficient, mainly study Japanese language in the special course of the university. Then, at the end of the special course, the research student must take a special entrance examination to the Master's course, usually for academic intellectual faculty and Japanese/English language proficiency. The examination usually involves an interview by the professor in charge. Only those who passed such special entrance examination are admitted entering the university as a regular student of the Master's course. Even after admitted, many classes are taught in Japanese, some explained in English, and some conducted in mixed languages. The importance of studying the Japanese language throughout their campus life cannot be overemphasized in addition to improving English proficiency. The FOUNDATION encourages its scholarship students to study Japanese language and extends financial assistance by means of compensating Japanese language tuition fees immediately after selected.

Recently some of Japanese universities have opened a new course such as International Graduate Course or Global Course for international students. They place their entrance examination and hold classes in English. Those universities do not necessarily specify how much proficiency in English is required, but many deem that more than 550 TOEFL ITP score record or the equivalent level in other English proficiency tests will be necessary. Even foreign students in International Graduate Course will need a certain level of Japanese language proficiency to fully enjoy their life in Japan. A recent study shows that the higher fluency in Japanese language a foreign student acquires, the more fruitful life they can spend in Japan.

MASTER'S DEGREE IN JAPANESE UNIVERSITIES

According to the educational system of Japan, the course for a Master's degree requires at least two years for study after graduation from a university (i.e., after completion of the whole course of 16 years conducted at school - 6 years in primary school, each 3 years in middle and high school and 4 years in faculty course of a university).

Those who have studied in such a course for the required terms of study, obtaining the necessary credits, and have passed the terminal examination after submission of their theses, will be given the Master's degree.
